Relationships

When you are young, your relationships are primarily with your family members and your friends. As you get older, you will develop more relationships with people outside of this circle. These new relationships will be with younger individuals, people your own age, and older individuals. You will have relationships with a wide range of people, such as family members, family friends, school friends, teachers, neighbors, people from the community, coworkers, and supervisors. The types of relationships you will have with these individuals will vary. Your behavior and speech must be appropriate for the type of relationship you have with each person.

Your current relationships may have influenced your values, interests, skills, and personality. These same relationships can assist you as you participate in assessment, conduct career research, and select a career to pursue.

Think about your relationships to complete the following:

1. Make a list of people with whom you have positive relationships.

2. How can these people help you succeed in life, specifically in choosing a career?
